Is there a name for the type of differential equation $\frac{dy(x)}{dx}=f(x,y(x))$? where y is just a function of x ? It seems like a generalization of ordinary differential equations. If so, what is this class called? EDIT: Actually, I am asking this because I am wondering if such classes are already discussed in the literature. A: In a general case it is a non-linear partial differential equation, that's why its called a differential equation. However, you mention that y is just a function of x and therefore it must be a function of one of the variables (let's say x) and not the other (let's call it z). What do you mean by function of x ? It is either a function of x or a function of z : let $z=g(x)$ (i.e. z is a function of x). Then $y(x)=y(z)=y(g(x))$ is the function of x . y is the function of the variable x , but we don't know about z . let z be a function of x , i.e. $y(x)=g(x)$ (i.e. z is a function of x). Then y is the function of x and therefore y is the function of z . y is the function of the variable x , but we don't know about z .
